Tapescript:

Ian:

OK. As you can probably guess, this photograph was taken in Rome. I took it about three years ago, I think, outside the Colosseum, which is probably one of Rome's most famous and familiar – um - Roman ruins.

And if you've been to Rome, you probably remember the, the, um, human statues or, um, street actors that are outside the Colosseum, um, where all the tourists are. Normally these actors are dressed up as Roman legionnaires .

Interviewer:

Legionnaires?

Ian:

Yes, you know, typical Roman soldiers – Roman soldiers or gladiators – you know what gladiators were, right?

Interviewer:

Yeah, yeah.

Ian:

OK. And the tourists pay, um, pay money to have their photographs taken with them, with the gladiators and Roman soldiers. Typically, they pose, you know... the Roman legionnaire attacks the tourist with a Roman sword, or, um, the tourist fights with the gladiator or something like that.

Anyway, personally I don't like photographs of myself, you know? I just don't like being in photos, whether I'm on holiday or not, but I like taking photos, I prefer to be the photographer. And, um, so I decided to take a quick photograph of this Roman legionnaire when he wasn't looking. He was having a break, I think, and he was buying an ice cream from an ice cream van – there are a lot of these vans selling drinks and ice creams and things near the Colosseum.

And, um, when I take photographs, I usually like them to include some kind of contrast, like, for example, oh, I don't know, a colour contrast or a contrast between in architecture. And obviously the contrast here was about time, past and present, Ancient Rome and modern Rome or Roman Italy and modern Italy – you know, Romans and ice cream, because ice cream didn't exist in Roman times... did it?

Out of time

Interviewer

Ice cream? Ooh, I don't know, um... no, I don't know.

Ian

Well, anyway. I like photographs with a story too. So the suitcases that you can see in the bottom left-hand corner, well, they make me think about whose suitcases they are and what's in them, you know, are they the Roman legionnaire's or not? I never knew the answer to that question. I don't know if they belonged to the man buying the ice cream or not. Anyway, that's more or less the story behind my photograph.
